IT was a raw windy day in that disappointing season known to mortals as spring. Cold, gray waves, flecked with foam, came sullenly plashing against a shore edged with halfmelted snow. Some ferryboats, their smoke beaten downward by the driving rain, steamed across the Bay as if in haste for shelter; a deeply-loaded coasting schooner came flying toward the Narrows with an anxious look of wishing herself in out of the storm; and only one strong boat, with a pilot s number on her reefed mainsail, beat in against the wind with a business-like air, as if there were a pleasure in the battle against wind, tide, storm, and fate, whichever won in the end.
