Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: .food in abundance, more or less, and perhaps all, will drop; so now is my time to go among them and clip away. I know it seems bad at first view, but all horticulturists must remember that it takes time to mature fruit or flower; such creations are not like mechanics, the work of hands, and controlled by man at will, but must be controlled by the laws of nature while guided by the hand of num. So let us cut away as soon as the flower opens, if we can, but any way as soon as the truit sets, and so deliver the tree of its overburden, and save to ourselves a fair crop of fine fruit. Now is my time too, I think, to sow my plaster, and 1 shall take my early morning time, when the dew is heavv, and sow from half a pint to a pint over each tree, for as it falls on the foliage and flower it will hold and assimilate the ammonia, making apparent its good effects for several weeks to come. Yesterday was half rainy, and, looking over my record, or map, of the trees, etc., on my place, it occurred to me that some had died and been replaced, with varieties of another sort. So I went over my ground in the intervening of showers, took down names, and then, in the house, recorded them in my book. I have found the best way of...
