Excerpt: .How, then, is the first sentence to be understood? and how the second, coming out of the first? How does the second sentence appear in its transformations in the second part? How can the character of each of these five sentences be perceived and brought into varied functions and relationships? and what change in the tone color of interpretation does the transformation of these sentences demand? The second example is found in the first Allegro of the E-flat major Sonata, Op. 7, a movement which to the unfamiliar glance is by no means so transparent as the one cited before. The Allegro starts out without introduction. The principal theme. B announces itself and its motive (A) plainly enough, and the latter remains recognizable even in its transformation (B). Less clear to an unfamiliar eye might be the following passage, until, after a long delay...
